What will we be eating in 20 years' time?

The rising of food prices, the growing population and environmental concerns are just a few issues that some organizations – including the United Nations and the government – been worrying about. How we will feed¹ ourselves in the future. Volatile food prices and a growing population mean we have to rethink what we eat, say food futurologists. So what might we be serving up in 20 years' time?

Insects, or mini livestock as they could become known, will become a staple² of our diet.

It's a win-win situation. Insects provide³ as much nutritional value as ordinary meat and are a great source of protein, according to researchers. They also cost less to raise than cattle, consume less water and do not have much of a carbon foot print. Plus, there are an estimated 1,400 species that are edible⁵ to men. Animals like crickets and grasshoppers⁶ will be ground down and used as an ingredient in food like burgers.

A large chunk of the world's population already eat insects as a regular part of their diet. Caterpillars⁷ and locusts⁸ are popular in Africa, wasps are a delicacy in Japan, crickets, are eaten in Thailand.

Problem solving situation

Our 17-year-old daughter started to smoke. It killed me to see that lovely girl with a cigarette in her mouth. I told her how I felt. Martha continued to smoke, saying "It's my life," etc. I told her if she didn't stop smoking, I wouldn't send her to college. She agreed to quit.

Last night I smelled cigarette smoke on Martha's breath. She confessed she had broken her word. Now I must make good my threat.

Martha is unusually bright and wants to teach handicapped children. I am working full-time to put her older sister through school and would do the same for Martha. My husband's salary is good, but with inflation eating us up we could never educate the girls unless I pitched in.

My theory is that if smoking is more important than college, I am a fool to work to put Martha through. Your opinion is wanted.
